Dawn of a new history: The search and re-creation of China's political and economic power

Having established its own economic, social, and political systems, China is writing a new history and setting itself apart from the West.

BY ZHENG YUANHUI

In a 1989 essay, which was republished in a 1992 book, Chinese human rights activist Liu Xiaobo declared, “declaring Western-style liberal democracy to be the most enlightened social and political system and the final form of human progress, Marxism made a big splash, perhaps because if the road of a popular revolution was paved with blood and tears, the latter should be followed by the least expensive and least damaging solution and the least opportunity for social instability and revolution.”

While the West is mired in its own woes, China’s rapid rise and sustainable growth have generated enough power to give rise to new national political and economic systems. This new kind of political and economic system is not only advantageous for China’s own development but also beneficial to the world.

The West’s political and economic system is based on the concept of “separation of power”, which is widely recognized as the foundation of a democratic society. However, this system has been under attack in recent years due to the rising popularity of authoritarianism and nationalism. The traditional political and economic system of the West has faced challenges from various sources, including economic crises, terrorism, and the rise of populist movements.

In contrast, China’s political and economic system is based on the principle of “collective leadership” and “socialism with Chinese characteristics”. China’s political and economic system is characterized by a strong central government, a well-developed industrial base, and a large and stable domestic market. These factors have enabled China to achieve rapid economic growth and social stability.

China’s unique political and economic system has brought about significant changes in the international arena. China has become a major player in global politics and economics, and its influence is growing at an unprecedented rate.

China’s political and economic system is not without its challenges. The Chinese government faces pressure from within and without to reform and modernize its system. Despite these challenges, China has shown remarkable resilience and adaptability in navigating the global political and economic landscape.

Looking to the future, China’s political and economic system will continue to evolve and adapt to the changing global landscape. The Chinese government will continue to work towards promoting peace, prosperity, and shared development for all nations.

In summary, China’s political and economic system represents a new and unique path for global governance. It is a system that is both dynamic and resilient, and one that holds the promise of a more equitable and prosperous future for all.

Source: The Business Times, p35
Date: 2 October 2019