Ultimate gift to medicine

They have died, but their bodies remain intact for up to three more years to serve as reference. Over the course of almost a year, Sunday Times journalist Calvin Yang and photojournalist Kuo Chuan Seng and Mark Chong documented the journey of these medical cadavers.

Serving others, even in death

Carmen, Norina, Elizabeth, Patricia or Lina. Each one of these women—unknown to the public—has made an unknown sacrifice. Their bodies are here to serve as a reference to the next generation of medical students.

The once graceful women who walked the streets of Singapore are now in this room, their bodies detached from their minds. They have given up their lives to serve the next generation of medical students. Their bodies are preserved to serve as a reference for the next generation of medical students.

Their sacrifice is a testament to the human spirit. Despite the challenges faced by the medical students, they are grateful for the sacrifice of these women. The women who have chosen to give their bodies to science are a true inspiration to all of us.

Thank you, Carmen, Norina, Elizabeth, Patricia, and Lina. You have made a sacrifice that will benefit the next generation of medical students.
