Big changes ahead in key rules of global order: Ng Eng Hen

Chong Ziliang

The world is at a turning point, with the fundamental rules of global order set to change on a scale not seen since the end of the Cold War, Defence Minister Ng Eng Hen said yesterday.

The Cold War, which ended more than 25 years ago, pitted communism against capitalism, a clash Dr Ng described as "one of the greatest conflicts of ideas in human history".

Today, it is the rise of marginal political groups amid the shifting of longstanding international alliances, he said at a conference held at Yale-NUS College in the National University of Singapore.

"Your generation will have ring-side seats to not only interesting times, but (also) dramatic interludes where the world is being reshaped," he added.

Dr Ng was speaking at the Yale-NUS Asia Pacific Model United Nations conference organised by the college's students.

It simulates a UN session, and participants debate and discuss some of today's most pressing issues. About 700 students from 25 countries are attending the sessions this weekend.

What holds for the future is uncertain, but there are three fault lines that will determine the outcome for the world in the coming decades, Dr Ng said, and he suggested that they ponder on them.

These are: Globalisation versus nationalism, global rules versus the regional order, and collective good governance versus individual rights.

"The tension at these fault lines, these competing themes, is under severe pressure. If the plates buckle, social and political tsunami will be created, and we will have to live with the changes," he said.

Tackling each in turn, Dr Ng noted that people around the world are increasingly sceptical of globalisation.

Global trade has created wealth and brought down poverty levels for many countries. But some communities also see globalisation as the reason for the loss of jobs and rise in immigration.

Even the United States, which is the "de facto champion of globalisation", is not immune from such stress, he said, as whole manufacturing cities in the "Rust Belt" region that used to be industrial hubs have gone into decline, while wages have remained stagnant.

While many studies show that countries which take in migrants reap overall benefits, "it is very hard to convince a worker who has lost his job of these benefits", he said.

These developments in part explain the British vote to leave the European Union and US President-elect Donald Trump's victory, Dr Ng added.

Two, the global world order underpinned by the US as the leading superpower is under challenge.

With the rise of big countries such as China, India and Indonesia, the global system governing trade and security may change in a multipolar world, he said.

Three, the rise of populism, which will give greater attention to individual interests over the collective good.

This will cause domestic politics to become polarised, as political parties campaign on the interests of different groups, hoping to win the popular vote by slim margins or through coalitions. The price would be an ever-shrinking common space, Dr Ng said.

Amid these changes, he added, Singaporeans have to ask themselves several questions such as how Singapore can stay relevant and how to ensure good jobs remain available to its citizens.

Responding to them will require the next generation to make wise and enlightened decisions that will help to ensure Singapore's place in the 21st century, he added.

ziliang@sph.com.sg