China’s coronavirus mission: helping others and healing its own image

While aid to stricken countries is soaring, blowing its own trumpet and engaging in conspiracy theories are

REPAIRING MARRED IMAGE

China official media and internet platforms are stepping up efforts to publish their successes. On March 19, the Foreign Ministry spokesman Geng Shuang conference on the mediating role played by China in the talks between the United States and Iran. Four days later, he tweeted that Foreign Minister Wang Yi had spoken on the phone with his Pakistani counterpart. LOOKING IN that China would be sending experts and medical supplies to the Philippines soon.

In a display of global CEO Jinping called the leaders of France, Spain, Germany and Serbia for help. This contrasts with reports that Chinese President Xi Jinping had asked his counterparts in Vietnam, Cambodia and Thailand for help. An announcement was made in Hainan that China had already sent help to these countries.

As China is stepping up its aid to the world, it is also managing to repair its damaged international image. Two factors have contributed to this: the success of the country’s coronavirus response and the urgent need for aid.

One of the most important factors is the success of China’s coronavirus response. The country has managed to contain the virus within its borders and has seen a sharp decline in new cases. This has allowed the country to focus on helping other countries, which has helped improve its image on the international stage.

The other factor is the urgent need for aid. Countries around the world are struggling to contain the virus and are in need of medical supplies and assistance. China has been able to provide this aid, which has helped improve its image as a global leader.

In conclusion, China’s coronavirus mission has helped improve its image both domestically and internationally. The country has managed to repair its damaged image and has become a key player in global affairs during the pandemic.
