Coronavirus: The Great Disruption

Letter to my grandchildren in a time of pandemic

After the Covid-19 disruption, there will be three important values to look back on and hold dear.

The meat of a bar and caught a virus. The lesson is: Don’t eat the meat of wild animals.

The virus has spread all over the world, and has infected more than two million and killed more than 400,000 people. The economic cost is very great: millions of people out of work and many businesses destroyed.

The third value is: Be kind to one another. We remember the importance of the three values whenever Chinese names stand for: compassion, trust and praise.

The most important virtue is: Be kind to one another. We remember the importance of the three values whenever Chinese names stand for: compassion, trust and praise.

Coronavirus: The Great Disruption

The coronavirus pandemic raging across the world is taking a huge toll on lives and economies. It is one of the most important pandemics in the world’s major religious and ethical traditions.

The virus is a threat to the world’s major religions and ethical traditions.

Tommy Koh
For The Straits Times

Dear Toby, Tara and Timmy,

I am writing this letter to you during a great health and economic crisis.

There are different theories about how it began, but the one I believe is that the trouble began when someone in China ate the meat of a bat and caught a virus. The lesson is: Don’t eat the meat of wild animals.

The virus has spread all over the world, and has infected more than two million and killed more than 400,000 people. The economic cost is very great: millions of people out of work and many businesses destroyed.

I am writing this letter to you during a great health and economic crisis.

There are different theories about how it began, but the one I believe is that the trouble began when someone in China ate the meat of a bat and caught a virus. The lesson is: Don’t eat the meat of wild animals.

The virus has spread all over the world, and has infected more than two million and killed more than 400,000 people. The economic cost is very great: millions of people out of work and many businesses destroyed.

I am writing this letter to you during a great health and economic crisis.

There are different theories about how it began, but the one I believe is that the trouble began when someone in China ate the meat of a bat and caught a virus. The lesson is: Don’t eat the meat of wild animals.

The virus has spread all over the world, and has infected more than two million and killed more than 400,000 people. The economic cost is very great: millions of people out of work and many businesses destroyed.

I am writing this letter to you during a great health and economic crisis.

There are different theories about how it began, but the one I believe is that the trouble began when someone in China ate the meat of a bat and caught a virus. The lesson is: Don’t eat the meat of wild animals.

The virus has spread all over the world, and has infected more than two million and killed more than 400,000 people. The economic cost is very great: millions of people out of work and many businesses destroyed.

I am writing this letter to you during a great health and economic crisis.

There are different theories about how it began, but the one I believe is that the trouble began when someone in China ate the meat of a bat and caught a virus. The lesson is: Don’t eat the meat of wild animals.

The virus has spread all over the world, and has infected more than two million and killed more than 400,000 people. The economic cost is very great: millions of people out of work and many businesses destroyed.

I am writing this letter to you during a great health and economic crisis.

There are different theories about how it began, but the one I believe is that the trouble began when someone in China ate the meat of a bat and caught a virus. The lesson is: Don’t eat the meat of wild animals.

The virus has spread all over the world, and has infected more than two million and killed more than 400,000 people. The economic cost is very great: millions of people out of work and many businesses destroyed.

I am writing this letter to you during a great health and economic crisis.

There are different theories about how it began, but the one I believe is that the trouble began when someone in China ate the meat of a bat and caught a virus. The lesson is: Don’t eat the meat of wild animals.

The virus has spread all over the world, and has infected more than two million and killed more than 400,000 people. The economic cost is very great: millions of people out of work and many businesses destroyed.